Lead Author: Brown, Erica Larae

Major: Sociology

College: College of Letters, Arts and Social Sciences-Cal Poly Pomona

Co-presenter(s):

Faculty Mentor(s): Mcgoldrick, Stacy

Presentation Type: Oral Presentations

Project Title: Black Broncos: An Extended Study on Racism Utilizing Campus Climate Surveying

Abstract: A The purpose of this research is to explore the specific types of insensitivities negativities microaggressions and racism that Black/African American students at Cal Poly Pomona have personally experienced because of their race in order to more accurately be able to describe the Campus Climate at CPP (the overall environment on campus). The African American community at Cal Poly Pomona is an underrepresented population and understudied when it comes to discrimination based on race/ethnicity as well as all other Cal Poly Pomona students when it comes to information on what students are learning about discrimination. This research takes undergraduate African American Students and analyzes their experiences with being African American at Cal Poly Pomona through in depth interviews Focus groups and community engagement. It examines what African American students are experiencing specifically in regards to race and what other students are learning about discrimination and inclusivity. Previous Research shows that comfort is vital in the academic success of college students. This study identifies the relationship between the discomfort and insensitivities African American students are experiencing and the effort of the university to prevent and eliminate these experiences and discomforts in all aspects of student life.